

It's also important not to combine things when they shouldn't be combined. There are times when combining two implementations into one would cause more complexity for the system as a whole or violate the Single Responsibility Principle, which states that any given module, class, or function should represent only one concept in the system.